Section AAnswer Question 01.

Source A

From the Memoirs of Edmund Ludlow, Parliamentary army officer, republican and regicide. Ludlow's Memoirs were written after the events he described.

A Parliament being called in 1640, it was clear to the MPs, and to all those who had any concern for the nation's happiness, that the King would do nothing to redress the present, or to secure the people from future mischiefs, choosing rather to oppose them by arms. The King resolved to impose by force of his arms that which he could not do by the strength of his arguments. I thought it my duty to enter into the service of the army of Parliament. I could not think that many of the people, who had been long oppressed and now had obtained a Parliament would not stand by their Parliament to the utmost of their power.

Source B

From Thomas Knyvett's letter to his wife, May 1642. Knyvett was a member of the Norfolk gentry who fought for Charles I.

The spirit of contradiction between King and Parliament is higher than ever. The one party now grows as determined as the other is obstinate. Oh, sweetheart, I am now very undecided what to do. I was given a commission by Ordinance of Parliament. I was unsure what to do, whether to take or refuse it. I was also given a Declaration against it by the King. This made me discuss what to do with some understanding men, which is no other than a great many men of quality do. If I receive further commands from Parliament that go against my obedience to the King, I shall do according to my conscience. This is the resolution of all honest men.
