Paper 9013/01

Paper 1

General comments

In general, performance appeared to be slightly better than last year with the exception of a few Centres. However, there was a general problem of candidates not clearly distinguishing their answers where they were asked to – for example, ‘explain four ways...’ or ‘outline three major beliefs...’. This creates problems when marking as the Examiner has to make decisions on behalf of the candidate as to where each part starts and finishes. Furthermore, in most questions with two parts, the first part was often tackled satisfactorily while the second part was not.

There was also a marked lack of reference to relevant Qur’anic passages to support arguments. Since such references are required for higher marks, this issue needs to be addressed urgently. It is this that shows insight into the syllabus and, hence, it has to be taken seriously. Most of the answers lacked in-depth treatment and critical stance. At this level of their education, where they are preparing to enter into Higher Education, candidates must be introduced to some form of criticality where they could take a stand and even possibly query particular ‘received opinions’. Criticality does not necessarily mean rejecting or doubting the import of the opinion, but it is a way of reflecting further on it and that is very helpful for academic development.

Sometimes points were made without discussion supported by specific examples. This reduces marks to a mere average or, at best, just above average. Points made should always be discussed in full, as much as time will allow, with specific and relevant examples for support.

Comments on specific questions

Section A

Question 1

This was a popular question on the beliefs and practices of the pagan Arabs of Makkah. On the whole, it was well answered, but there was a problem with some candidates in identifying the three beliefs/practices, as they tended not to clearly distinguish them in the script. Again, some merged the answers between (a) and (b). Furthermore, very little reference was made to the specific Qur’anic passages critiquing the pagan practices and beliefs.

- (a) The question was looking for clearly identified jahili beliefs and practices with allusions to Qur’anic contexts in which they have been mentioned. Issues regarding the religious and the socio-political set-up of the jahili society should have provided enough points for discussion. Issues like: Idolatry, superstition, social organisation, morality, treatment of women, treatment of female babies, raids and warfare were some the main points expected.
- (b) The second part asked for an explanation of why the Qur’an was critical of any two points raised in (a). Candidates were expected to give details about the Qur’anic teachings that had been contravened. For higher marks, they were expected to show a confident understanding of the way in which those beliefs and practices departed from the Qur’anic teaching. This is where good candidates would show their familiarity with basic Qur’anic teachings on the subjects mentioned and use cross-referencing to support their discussion.

Question 2

This was not a very popular question. For those who answered it, there was the problem of not distinguishing between the two parts on the qualities of the Prophet Muhammad: Prophet and Statesman. Many candidates failed to address the actual question and simply outlined the aspects of the biography of the Prophet. There were some good general answers on the Khulafaa al-Rashidun which has nothing to do with the question. Candidates were expected to show very clearly qualities of the Prophet, indicating his prophetic status and also those showing that he was statesmanlike. Good candidates were to show that the qualities of a statesman flowed out of the prophetic office and therefore the two are linked. Hence, excellent candidates would have gone on to question the very premise of the distinction. Generally, the issues to be raised include the qualities of the prophet exhibited in Makkah; how he dealt with the socio-political and religious issues of the community; how he related his experience to the people; how he reacted to them when persecuted; his experience in al-Taif; the attitude in Madinah; leadership qualities exhibited in the various roles he played; the years of struggle; attitudes towards prisoners of war and enemies in general; the Treaty of Hudaibiyya; and the Fall of Makkah and amnesty.

Question 3

This was probably the least popular question – on the policies of the Rightly Guided Caliphs. The few who answered it did not clearly distinguish between (a) and (b), providing general information on the Caliphs which did not address the question. They often touched on Abu Bakr and 'Umar, almost ignoring the periods of 'Uthman and Ali. The question was looking for particular actions of the Caliphs showing that they were aware of the legacy of the Prophet and carried out policies to continue and expand on them. Reference should have been made to: Abu Bakr's insistence on carrying out the raids to the north, his reluctance to collect the Qur'an, and the Riddah wars; 'Umar's readiness to abide by new decisions reached at a consensus, his various activities to expand Islam; 'Uthman and the authoritative collection of the Qur'an; and 'Ali's concern for Islamic unity. Better answers were expected to discuss the activities of the Caliphs in tackling new problems using methods founded on the Prophetic legacy. Excellent candidates were expected to show awareness of the huge challenges faced by the Caliphs in living up to expectation in following the footsteps of the Prophet.

Section BQuestion 4

This was a very popular question on Surat Al-Ikhlās, but many failed to provide cross-referencing within the Qur'an, simply commenting on the text of the Surah. The answers should have demonstrated detailed knowledge of and the significance of the Surah. These should have been focused on the main theme of the Surah Tawhid, but candidates were also expected to refer to other passages where the theme is mentioned to support the discussion. Furthermore, they were to explain, with confidence, the fundamental importance of the belief in Oneness of God in Islamic belief and practice.

Question 5

This was not a popular question, but those who attempted it showed a good familiarity with the general stories of Moses and related them often with details that were not necessary. Even though most candidates referred to Surah al-Qasas, they were expected to show familiarity with the storyline of Surah 2: 47-74 as well, since both are in the syllabus. The performance was better for the first part compared to the second part. In the first part they were expected to give the general teachings of the Qur'an about Moses from these passages, including his general background, his experience at the burning bush, his call to prophethood and his experience in Egypt before the Pharaoh. The second part was looking for ways in which the experiences of Moses resembled those of the Prophet – for example, their childhood, call to prophethood, their experience of persecution, fleeing their homes, eventual triumph, their experience of being misunderstood, their resolve and commitment to their call.

Question 6

This was a popular question on the compilation of the Quran and generally well answered. However, only a few candidates gave excellent answers, showing familiarity with the details of the topic. Answers in part (a) should have started from the period of Abu Bakr's Khilafah; references to the battle of Yamamah, 'Umar's advice, the collection and the Mushaf of Hafsa; 'Uthman's collection, the news of the variant readings, his decision to issue an authoritative version, the part played by Zayd b. Thabit and his team, and 'Uthman's decision to destroy the inauthentic copies. Part (b) should have included: the threat of the text disappearing or being corrupted, the desire to show continuity with the past and to offer the text 'immortality', and other pragmatic reasons.

Section CQuestion 7

This was a straightforward question on almsgiving and fasting, but many answers were disappointing. One candidate would not give that much detail for the first part, and many failed to relate the second part to a particular Muslim community as the question specifically demanded. There were also cases where candidates confused the requirements of (a) with those of (b). The question demanded a thorough account of the two institutions in Islam, looking at their importance. It looked for accounts as to how the two institutions enable community to focus on the Islamic faith, link it with God and unite its members. The second part was to provide details of the specific circumstances of the chosen country, pointing out how the institutions help in the real human context.

Question 8

This was a rather unpopular question, on three ways in which God communicates knowledge and awareness of himself to created human beings. The few who attempted it did not provide adequate answers, tending to enumerate Books, Prophets, and Angels as the three ways. Many possibly did not understand the question and hence deviated from the expected line of discussion. It was expected that there would be a clear reference to the three chosen ways which may include: revelation, knowledge from the natural world, mystical experience and reason. It was expected that candidates would then discuss the relative importance of each of these as God's way of communicating with humankind and how they relate to each other. References from the Qur'an and Hadith to support points made are also encouraged.

Question 9

Answers to this question, on Resurrection and the Day of Judgement, were not outstanding. Some candidates answered it satisfactorily, but many failed to outline the nature of Resurrection and how the Judgement related to everyday life. The question demanded outlining what happens at Resurrection including discussing how conduct in this life is judged. Good answers were expected to include details about living a life according to the teachings of the Qur'an and the Sunnah. Candidates should have discussed issues including: responsibility, accountability, morality, fairness, justice, charitableness and humility as some of the effects of the beliefs. Relevant Qur'anic and Ahadith references were expected.

Section DQuestion 10

This was a very popular question on the Sunnah, and candidates did quite well in answering it. They were able to express the relationship between the Qur'an and the Sunnah very well. Even though some provided full answers, others gave basic examples. The question asked for a discussion of the ways the two bases of law are related and hence, an account of the relationship was expected. This should include examples indicating the complementary nature of the Sunnah and how the latter acts as a commentary on the former. Specific examples, including Salah, Saum, Zakah, Hajj and general activities in Muslim life, could be identified to show the difficulty of understanding some parts of the Qur'an without recourse to the Sunnah. Excellent candidates should be able to refer to the argument of the anti-hadith group, who suggest that the Qur'an must be the only frame of reference and that the Sunnah is not needed.

Question 11

This question, on the two legal sources of consensus and analogy, was not popular or particularly well answered. Many simply provided definitions, rather than relating it in detail to the wider issues of jurisprudence. The question demanded accounts of the use of each source, as well as an indication of awareness of the other sources of law and of the fact that consensus and analogy are subordinate to the Qur'an and the Sunnah. Excellent candidates were to give a detailed explanation of how the Qur'an and Sunnah are taken into account when exercising consensus and analogy, and how the experts involved will always be scholars in the primary sources.

Question 12

Not a particularly popular question, this question on the Shari'ah was generally poorly answered. Candidates failed to clearly outline the four examples required and tended to generalise without specifying identifying particular areas of the Shari'ah. This question was eliciting a discussion on the problems and challenges faced by Muslims in a named country in modern times as they seek to live by the principles of the Shari'ah. Candidates were expected to examine issues including: education, legislation, food, dress, funerals, marriage, divorce, inheritance, punishment, financial transactions, business operations and general social life. Candidates were expected to comment on the way in which Muslims who observe the Shari'ah are influenced, with specific examples from the chosen country.

General comments

The same general comments as for Paper 1 apply here.

Also, there were a number of cases where candidates attempted fewer than the five demanded by the paper. Some candidates did not state the actual number of the question they were attempting, which presents difficulties for the Examiners.

Comments on specific questionsSection AQuestion 1

This was a popular question on the whole, but many candidates tended not to answer it in much detail. Many showed awareness of the basic details of the Umayyad Dynasty, but failed to show detailed knowledge. Occasionally, candidates concentrated on Mu'awiyya or extended the coverage of their answers beyond the year 700. The question specifically states the boundary of the year 700; therefore, any information about the period beyond that is superfluous. The Caliphs to be concentrated upon were: Mu'awiyya, Mu'awiyya 11, Marwan and Abdul Malik. Candidates were to discuss the major problems within the Ummah and with the Byzantines, to provide accounts of reactions of the 'Alids, as well as the regional factions among the Arabs, the Mawali, etc., in order to show detailed knowledge.

Question 2

This was a very popular question, on the change of dynasty from Umayyads to 'Abassids. However, for many of those who answered it, there was a problem in part (b) of not properly distinguishing between the three reasons asked for in the question. Many candidates were aware of the reasons for the collapse of the Umayyads and the coming into power of the 'Abbasids, but the degree of detail varied. They were to give details of events from the time of 'Abbasid propaganda stirrings in the late 'Umayyad period. The candidates were to give accounts that chronicled the stages of decline in Umayyad confidence and power and the rise in confidence among the 'Abbasid supporters. Particular attention was to be paid to names, places and dates, among other details. The reasons could include: widespread dissatisfaction; discrimination against the Mawalis; persecution of the Shi'i; general un-Islamic attitudes and policies; material wealth; petty jealousies and even self-inflicted problems.

Question 3

On the whole, this question on the decline of the 'Abbasid Caliphs was answered adequately. The more confident candidates appeared to answer it in preference to other questions in Section A. There were some very good answers with good details. However, dates and names of Caliphs became generally problematic. Many candidates did not focus on the scope of the question. Hence, some unnecessary details about others outside the scope were provided. The discussion should have focused on the period after al-Ma'mun, and yet some candidates spent quite some time on Harun al-Rashid and previous Caliphs. Details could have included: the regional autonomy granted to governors, the Turkish mercenaries employed by al-Mutawakkil and others. Candidates were expected to give confident discussions that show a full grasp of the issues and how these factors contributed to the decline.

Section BQuestion 4

This was not a very popular question on al-Shafi'i, and the few who attempted it were not able to do much justice to it. First of all, many of them failed to provide much biographical detail of al-Shafi'i, with some candidates even skimming over al-Shafi'i completely and then concentrating on the merits of Hanafi fiqh. There were, however, a few very good answers which outlined details about the importance of the Risala in relation to other schools of fiqh. The question demanded an account of al-Shafi'i's achievements in Islamic Law. Details were expected to include his identification of the relationship between the Qur'an and Sunnah and how this differed from earlier attitudes. It was also expected that candidates would make a comparison between al-Shafi'i and other major fuqaha. The question also specifically demanded that candidates give full reasons for agreeing or disagreeing with the claim.

Question 5

This was a relatively popular question but, on the whole, not well answered. In part (a) there were various identifications of the three methods, some of which were consistently shown across examination Centres, which seemed to suggest the use of a common textbook. Some candidates confused the three methods with three categories of hadith and therefore focused on Sahih, Hasan and Daif. In part (b), there was a lack of understanding, and many of the candidates could not identify the characteristics of the six works, let alone identify the shared characteristics. Some even thought that the six canonical collections were schools of thought. The question demanded details which could have included: the sanad, the character of the reporters, credibility of the narrator, Asma al-Rijal, the matn, recorded material verified by memorized data and vice versa, travelling to meet actual living reporters/narrators, believability/credibility, and chronology of the narrators.

Question 6

This question on the Mu'tazilah was relatively popular and generally satisfactorily attempted. Many made some interesting comments that enabled them to score well. Answers were supposed to focus on the two named principles, but it was also expected that candidates would give basic identification of who the Mu'tazilah were, indications of their difference from other Muslims, discussions of the two principles for which they stood and confident accounts of their rationalistic theology. Good candidates were expected to show familiarity with Mu'tazilah's own argument, claiming that they were protecting and projecting the true Islam.

Section CQuestion 7

This question was answered by many candidates but a significant number failed to provide details of the two battles, especially of Siffin. Unfortunately, some candidates used this question to express some unsavoury comments about other Islamic groups. Many of the candidates failed to make definite references to their significance, as the question specifically demanded, merely retelling the stories of Siffin and Karbala. For part (a), the details should have included the description of the battle of Siffin, disagreement and break up-of Ali's supporters, with comments on the implications. For part (b), Karbala, it was expected that candidates would give descriptions of the main events, the meaning of Hussain's death and the importance of the example of Hussain's resistance in later Shi'i theology.

Question 8

This question on al-Ghazali was answered quite well by candidates. However, many failed to identify the Ihya' and talked about al-Ghazali's ideas with no reference to sources. Some candidates just gave general outlines of Sufism with only a fleeting reference to al-Ghazali. Answers were supposed to include accounts of al-Ghazali's synthesis of inner meaning and outer adherence to Islam. It was expected that candidates would give basic descriptions of him and his main works, mentioning at least accounts of the Ihya', including comments on his method of advocating the requirement of Islam and, in addition, understanding their full meaning. As the question demanded, candidates were to show examples of his attempts to bring the two forms of belief together.

Question 9

Very few candidates answered this question on the philosophers, and those that did, with a few exceptions, did not show much competence in the subject. The question was asking for identification of basic teachings that might include: supremacy of reason over revelation, the use of Greek learning, eternity of the world, the eternity of the Qur'an and anthropomorphism. Candidates were expected to show how these diverged from orthodox beliefs. Confident identification of names and concepts were expected for good marks.

Section DQuestion 10

On the whole, this question was quite well answered, but there was a tendency for some candidates to focus on only one person rather than the two required. Even where two were discussed, it was often the case that there was a serious imbalance in the space given to them. The question was looking for basic biographical accounts, references to their major ideas and confident discussions and assessment of their value. Details on Muhammad Abduh were expected to include: as a scholar, educationist, mufti, 'alim, theologian, reformer, his critique of socio-political issues in Egypt and the Muslim world in general. For Hasan al-Banna, a discussion could look at other things including: as a teacher, reformer, social critic, founder of the Muslim Brotherhood, and the influence of his ideas on other Islamic movements. The details of Muhammad Iqbal could include: as a poet, philosopher, lawyer, political thinker, reformer, and his alleged influence on people like Syed Qutb, 'Ali Shariati and Sadiq al-Mahdi.

Question 11

This was a very popular question, on the teachings of the Qur'an about women, and was answered by the majority of candidates. Even though some attempted to give relevant Qur'anic and Hadith references, very often, these were wrongly cited. General comparison with contemporary practices lacked in detail, and not many specific examples with reference to particular countries were given. The thrust of the question was often ignored and the conclusions did not respond adequately to the question. The question specifically asked 'how far do you agree or disagree...' and yet adequate response to this was very rare. The question was looking for accounts of the main teachings about women in the Qur'an, precise references to what these are, comparison with present-day practices, references to particular countries and the norms there, and also confident and reasoned comparisons of the Qur'an and present practice in specific places in identified situations.

Question 12

This was another popular question and generally well answered, even though many candidates tended to concentrate on the problems rather than the opportunities. There was also a tendency for those who chose Western contexts, to show serious distortions concerning the situation of Muslims in Europe and the United States of America. The many opportunities Muslims have in the West are totally ignored. Even though some gave very good answers, others were generally mediocre. The question was looking for descriptions of Islam in the particular country selected, basic discussions of the problems and opportunities, and confident accounts that recognised conditions affecting the chosen community, including: living under secular law, as a minority or under laws that do/do not reflect Islamic law.
