2 Participant observation is a widely used method of sociological research. It is particularly favoured by sociologists in the interpretivist tradition. In participant observation the researcher joins the study group in order to observe people in their natural surroundings and to learn to see and feel things as they do. Participant observation studies are usually carried out over a long time period.

Gaining access to the group in order to begin the research can be a problem. Some researchers choose to reveal their identity to some or all of the people they are studying. This is known as overt participant observation. In covert participant observation the research is carried out secretly, with the researcher concealing their identity from the group.

Supporters of participant observation argue that it enables the sociologist to achieve a detailed understanding of the subject under study and that the data it produces is high in validity. However, critics identify a number of limitations with participant observation, especially the many ethical problems that are associated with covert observation.

3 Although women are a growing proportion of the paid labour force in most modern industrial societies, there is still gender inequality in terms of wages and job conditions. Women usually earn less than men and are more likely to be employed on a part-time or temporary basis only. Women are also likely to be found in lower-paid occupations such as clerical work, professional work in health, education and welfare, repetitive assembly work, cleaning and catering.

It also remains the case that the top positions in most workplaces are dominated by men. In 2008, women in the UK still constituted only around 2% of chief executives and company directors, 6% of all judges, and 16% of senior managers. The low representation of women in these top positions is seen by feminists as evidence of a 'glass ceiling' that women encounter as they progress in their careers and which very few go beyond. Some feminists believe that the inequality women face in the workplace reflects the gender division of labour within the home. They refer to studies showing that the majority of labour within the home is carried out by females.
