Question 2: Pre-Mughal Bengal

The Early Kingdoms in Bengal: The Pala dynasty and the Senas

The Pala Empire under Devapala

Until the establishment of greater control by the first ruler of the Pala dynasty in the eighth century AD, there had been considerable disorder. The dynasty extended its territory under his son and his successor. Religious policy was particularly successful and spiritual life was encouraged. Foreign records are a good source about this period and reveal many strengths of Pala rule. However, the death of the ruler Devapala brought about a decline. Attempts by rulers from the late tenth century to 1124 did halt the decline, but the twelfth century saw the fall of the Palas and the rise of the Sena dynasty.

Question 3: The British period

The Arrival of the British

An eighteenth-century British print of the Battle of Palashi (Plassey)

During the war with France, which broke out in 1756, the British used internal divisions in Bengal to their advantage. They weakened the position of Sirajuddaula and when the disputes between the Nawab and the British led to conflict, it was the East India Company that was victorious. The decisive battle took place at Palashi in 1757. The British installed a puppet ruler in Bengal. British influence was extended by the acquisition of three districts in 1760 and by gaining the right to collect revenue. A treaty of 1765 allowed Bengal to be ruled by collaborators with the British in return for surplus revenues, but the rule of the Company did little for the people of Bengal. There was considerable hardship in the Great Famine of 1769–1770 and as a result of reforms to Company rule, such as the Permanent Settlement of 1793.

Question 4: From Pakistan to Bangladesh (1947–71)

Problems of national integration. Political mobilisation and events leading to independence.

The newspaper ‘Dawn’ reports that Martial Law is announced in 1958.

There had been considerable protests since 1947 about the issue of language in Bengal. After the formation of the Awami Muslim League in 1949, there was growing opposition. A major turning point was an agreement by opposition parties to work together in December 1953. However, despite opposition electoral success in 1954, the central government refused to allow it to rule and appointed a new Governor. The new Constitution of Pakistan was created in 1956, but martial law was declared in October 1958. This lasted until 1962. There were important changes and developments, but there was still a demand for political change; a new leader of the Awami League, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman emerged in 1963. His arrest in 1968 was a turning point.
