Pierre and his sister Louise lived with their parents in a small town near Lyon in the south of France. They had several good friends in the same street and they liked to go out to the cinema together from time to time.

Recently, Pierre telephoned his friend Antoine to ask if he would like to see a comedy with him and his sister. Antoine replied that he would be delighted to accompany them and he said he would bring his brother as well.

The young people decided to meet at half past seven at the café in the main square. As it was a Saturday evening, many customers were sitting at tables or standing at the counter but fortunately the friends succeeded in finding a place.

While drinking the coffees that they had ordered, they talked of what they had done during the week. Finally they went to buy their tickets. After paying, they examined the posters which gave details of all the new films.

The film was very funny and everyone spent an excellent evening. 'I think Louise and I will come back next weekend,' said Pierre to the two boys, 'and we will see an adventure film this time. Does that idea interest you?' Naturally the others were in agreement!
