Section A: Research Methods

1 Positivist sociologists prefer quantitative methods of data collection. Quantitative data is often collected by means of a social survey in which the researcher gathers responses from questionnaires or structured interviews. Whichever method is used, the researcher has to identify a sample. However, the type of sample they choose will have a significant effect on the validity of the results obtained.

The researcher must also decide whether to carry out a pilot study. The results of a pilot study will enable plans to be reviewed and may help decide which sampling method to use. The variety of sampling methods available to the researcher is vast, including random sampling, quota sampling, stratified sampling and the rarely-used snowball sampling. Each of these types of sampling has strengths but with each there are limitations. However, the choice of sampling method will influence the outcome of the research, as will the accuracy of the sampling frame.

Other researchers reject quantitative research methods in favour of qualitative methods.

Section C: Social Stratification and Inequality

4 Marxist sociologists have suggested that modern industrial societies have undergone a process of proletarianisation, through which white-collar work has become deskilled. Deskilling has also occurred amongst blue-collar workers.

(a) What is meant by the term blue-collar workers?

.....
.....

(b) Describe two examples of deskilling.

5 Stratification continues to be a feature of almost all societies, though there may be less inequality in modern industrial societies than in traditional societies. Social class is the basis of stratification in modern industrial societies, and in some of these societies an aristocracy remains part of the class system.

(a) What is meant by the term aristocracy?

(b) Describe two examples of social inequality.

(d) To what extent has there been a reduction in social inequality in modern industrial societies in recent years?

A series of horizontal dotted lines provided for writing the answer to the question.

Section D: Power and Authority

6 It has been claimed that, even in democratic political systems, elite groups control the power of the state.

7 It is claimed that class de-alignment has occurred in some modern industrial societies, and that this is affecting voting behaviour. In these societies the concept of political socialisation would seem irrelevant.

(a) What is meant by the term class de-alignment?

.....
.....
..... [2]

(b) Describe two influences on voting behaviour, apart from social class.
